Searching, Searching, Searching

Monday, August 12th, 2013

As you read this blog entry, I call your attention to the archives section on the right side of the page. It should now be easier to locate a specific tree care topic by using the search function. Just follow the instruction and the entries related to your topic or keyword should be displayed in a listing that will allow you to access a particular entry directly from that listing. That way, you won't have to go back and scroll through the entries by month and year, just to find a topic of interest. I have over 4 years of posts, which cover most of the relevant basic tree care topics, so you should be able to locate relevant information. If you try, and cannot locate an article on your topic, please e-mail me, and I'll try to add something to help.

I am also trying to add the direct comment feature to the blog site, but the cost for doing so may still be prohibitive. So, I ask for your patience, and encourage you to use the e-mail function to communicate with me. It's not the best, or normal, way for most blogs, but right now it is the way we have to go. Hopefully, I'll get it worked out.

I'm going to continue trying to make this section of MCFC's website as user friendly as possible, because the more informed you are about the basics of urban tree care, the better you can be the kind of steward your trees deserve. Stay tuned.....

Direct Comments Can Be Made Now!

Sunday, August 18th, 2013

Well.....after finally checking it out, I have discovered that the direct comments section is now functional! All that is required is to log in through the comments tab at the bottom of the blog entry. You will be asked for a user name and password to register, then you can log in and post your reply; you can also read other posted replies. All comments are welcome, but be brief; there are a limited number of characters available. If you have detailed or specific questions about plant care, please feel free to e-mail me at: blogger@mocommunitytrees.org. I'll do my best to help.

Thanks for visiting!
